1 The entrance

Every exhibition starts with its entrance page: the title, a short introduction, the story behind the photographs and a cover picture. Click Enter the exhibition to go in.

2 Choose how to look

At the top right you can switch between up to three ways of looking. The curator decides which ones are available.

- Mosaic: all the photographs together, side by side. Good for a first look.
- Gallery: the photographs with their titles underneath, with more space around each one.
- Wall: one photograph at a time, as large as your screen allows.

Find a photograph

- Search: type a word in Find a photograph…. It looks in the titles, the authors, the descriptions and the tags.
- Tags: if the photographs have tags, a Filters + button appears next to the photograph count. Click it and pick a tag to see only those photographs; click the tag again, or All photographs, to see everything.
- Nothing found? Click Clear search and filters to start again.

3 Look at one photograph up close

Click any photograph to open it on the Wall. You'll see its title, the author and, if there is one, a short description.

- Use the ‹ and › arrows on each side, or the arrow keys on your keyboard, to move to the previous or next photograph.
- Click Slideshow to let the photographs change on their own, about every five seconds. Click Pause to stop.

4 About the exhibition

About takes you back to the entrance page, where you can read the introduction and the story of the exhibition again.

Good to know

- The photographs are never cropped: you always see them as the photographer framed them.
- FullFrame appears in the exhibition's language. The links at the bottom of every page lead to FullFrame's home page, where you can find other open exhibitions.
